IN this little volume I have collected together some speeches delivered in the House of Commons and elsewhere. I have not, however, in all instances given reference to any place or time of delivery, because I have rather been anxious that each chapter should represent, as far as possible, the present state of the subject. With this object, I have, in some cases, made changes so extensive that such a reference would in fact be incorrect. It will be for others to judge how far I have succeeded in making good the positions taken up; this only I may say, that I have spared no pains in collecting and verifying my facts.
