PREFACE.

Before beginning the study of grammar, pupils should be carefully trained in the use of language. Correctness and facility in speaking and writing are best gained by practice; but while it is true that habit, rather than a knowledge of syntactical rules, controls a speaker's or writer's use of English, yet, in one who claims to be a scholar, ignorance of the history and structure of his language is no more excusable than ignorance in any other department of knowledge.

By the grammar of a language we mean the facts of the language. In teaching grammar, we should remember that pupils are to become acquainted with those facts, as far as possible, through their own efforts. Let the child become a discoverer, and let him experience the satisfaction that comes to every discoverer of truth.

Grammar should be taught inductively. Pupils should be led, first, in the light of their own experience, to study the simple facts of language, and then to investigate the more difficult matters of construction and inflection until they arrive at the general laws which govern its structure. In other words, pupils should be helped to help themselves. And yet it is next to impossible to present inductive lessons throughout a text-book. Lessons must be prepared for classes of pupils; and no one but the teacher can know to what extent each child needs illustrative exercises, or when he is prepared to take the next step.

This book is prepared on a plan somewhat different from that followed in most Grammars for schools. There are certain facts of grammar which must be learned before the mastery of other facts becomes possible. But although it is necessary, for example, to know something of the nature of nouns and verbs before beginning to analyze a sentence, it is not necessary to teach all that pertains to nouns and verbs and to tax the pupils at the outset with intricacies and difficulties of language beyond their grasp. Strict classification of subjects demands such a course, but careful gradation forbids it. It will therefore be found that though each of the three parts into which this book is divided contains one central idea, its plan of development demands frequent repetition and reviews.

Thus, in Part I, we have endeavored to lead the pupil, by easy steps, (1) to understand the usual constructions of sentences, and (2) to study the uses of words and to classify them as parts of speech. This part of the work can be done easily in a year; and should the pupil proceed no farther, he will have gained possession of the most essential facts concerning the language.

In Part II. we call the pupil's attention to inflection, its extent and use; and also to the substitutes for inflection, which are peculiarly important in a language like ours.

In Part III. the preceding work is again carefully reviewed, and some of the more important difficulties are considered. Much attention is here given to analysis, and, in order to facilitate practice in this and to heighten its value, many carefully selected sentences are supplied, illustrating almost every peculiarity of construction.

This book is designed for use in the three grades next below the High School, and each Part contains the work for one school year.

In the preparation of this work, the authors have received help from valuable works on philology by Professors Earle, Morris, Lounsbury, and Whitney. They are also indebted to the excellent works on grammar by Dr. Bain and Professors Whitney, Meiklejohn, Tweed, Mulligan, and others.

For a careful reading of our proof, our thanks are due to Miss Emma Fisher, of the Normal School at Bridgewater, Mass., and to Professor D. O. S. Lowell, of the Latin School at Roxbury, Mass.

The authors will esteem it a favor if their attention is called to defects in the book, to the end that it may be improved.
