ACKNOWLEDGMENT

The following chapters have been given as lectures at various conferences and conventions. Most of them have been published in periodicals; my thanks for permission to reprint are due to the publishers of The Hibbert Journal, The American Journal of Theology, The International Journal of Ethics, The Biblical World, The Homiletic Review, The Journal of Philosophy, Psychology, and Scientific Methods, Religious Education; to the American Unitarian Association, which published one of the chapters in pamphlet form; and to the American Sociological Society, which published another chapter in its volume of proceedings for 1919.

The essays gathered from these quarters have a unity of viewpoint and argument, which is the result of a long and earnest study of the potentialities and shortcomings of the churches, and, in particular, in recent years, an interest in the constructive work of the Religious Education Association. Suggestions and criticisms have come from sources too numerous to mention, but in particular from colleagues and pupils at the University of Illinois, Wesleyan University, and Vassar College. Many letters received from readers of my "Problems of Religion" have urged the formulation of such an argument as this; and indeed it may be considered as a sort of practical postscript to that volume.
