THE form in which the following pages appear, requires a few lines of explanation. It was stated in the Pamphlet entitled "Policy of England," &c. that the author had been induced to reply to Lord Carnarvon, because Lord Carnarvon's reputation and character gave weight to the errors into which he had fallen; and, upon like grounds, no notice was taken of certain attacks that appeared in the Tory Journals, nor of some unmannerly Pamphlets, in which the facts and arguments contained in the "Policy," &c. were impugned. The author entered the lists with Lord Carnarvon, and waited impatiently for his Lordship to take up the gauntlet that had been thrown down. His Lordship, however, gave no signs of life, and a respectable Review having published an attack upon the Pamphlet, the author determined upon answering

it. The Reply was actually in the Press when a second edition of Lord Carnarvon's work was announced, which there was good reason to believe was to be accompanied by some strictures upon the Pamphlet, and it was judged expedient to await its appearance.

The author might possibly have thought otherwise if he had been aware that so great a length of time would have taken place between its announcement and its publication; a delay of which the cause can be surmised, as well as the reason why the work appeared at the particular moment it did; and certainly those reasons are not to be looked for in that absence of party spirit to which his Lordship lays claim. The author now publishes his reply to the article in the Quarterly Review: for, although a portion of the general observations which that reply contains may be now somewhat out of date, subsequent events have only served to prove the correctness of what is advanced in them.

S E Q U E L,

ETC. ETC.

AN article has appeared in the Quarterly Review, which it would be most ungrateful on our part not to acknowledge, for we consider it the greatest triumph which has signalised our attempt to prevent the British public from being misguided, and to make known the whole truth upon a subject of great importance, as regards the foreign policy of our Government, and the interests of our country. Aware as we are of the combination of parliamentary and newspaper talent which has been employed in the attempt to refute our arguments, and contradict our facts, we confess we hardly expected that our adversaries, by the poverty of their statements, and the superabundance of their malice, should have allowed judgment to go by default.

Of the first portion of the Review we shall say nothing, as it consists only of extracts from Lord Carnarvon's work, occasionally broken by fragments of original matter, which, as they serve for a foil, and bring out in high relief the graceful style of the author of the work on Portugal and Galicia, we have no doubt will be viewed by his Lordship with the same feelings of thankfulness, which we
