The marginal numbers refer to other paragraphs which contain matters connected with the subject under consideration.

1. VERY great is the collective amount of the suffering endured by those who 'never had a day's illness in their lives.'—The strong, broad-shouldered man tortured with the toothache; the clever man a perfect martyr to corns; the well-looking lady who plays, without faltering, her part in the world, whose life is regular as her appearance is healthy, yet on whose brow the attentive observer can detect the worn look of unrest that tells of a headache. These afford but a few illustrations of the many sufferers from the minor evils of life: Those lesser miseries which
