TABLE OF CONTENTS.

PREFACE.	PAGE
The British Electors' suspicion of theory ...	xi is mistaken because (1) historically, grand political epochs coincide with grand religious and philosophical epochs, ... ..	xii
and (2) political practice and theory are as a matter of fact inseparable. ... ..	xii
This is particularly the case when politics become constructive ... ..	xiii
as they are to-day. ... ..	xiv
For constructive political work the organic conception of society is the most fruitful. ...	xvii
As the Socialist alone considers not only the individual but the social unit in his work he must have a clear idea of what the nature of the unit is. ... ..	xviii
This necessitates a re-statement of the Socialist conception of historical progress. ... ..	xix
The circumstances under which the Sixth Edition is being prepared....	xxi

CHAPTER I. THE PROBLEM.

The Problem is Poverty, which is not merely physical but mental and moral. ... ..	1
Outward improvement may proceed along with vital decay. ... ..	3
The question does not merely affect the workman, but the capitalist ... ..	4
and the whole of society. ... ..	7
Individuality is rare under modern conditions. ...	7
The reason is that each function in society is self-centred and competitive; ... ..	8
hence, co-ordination is the task of the Twentieth Century ... ..	10

CHAPTER II.—SOCIETY AND THE INDIVIDUAL.

Political policies depend upon what view one takes of the social type of unity. ... ..	11
Does the organic type correspond to facts? ...	12
Individualist psychology exaggerates the free play of the human will, ... ..	13
whilst the Socialist conception of function ...	14
and the dependence of the individual upon society as illustrated in the change of individual function which follows social re-organisation, ...	16
are in accord with the biological view of social progress, viz: that it depends upon modification of the social structure. ... ..	19
in which the supreme effort of individual will through force, e.g., Revolution, counts little ...	21
The purely individual functions in progress are:
1—Alterations of social structure by industrial invention, etc. ... ..	25
2—Alterations of social structure by effective moral demand. ... ..	26
A To the race, however, belongs the inheritance of the past, and the individual shares in that inheritance through his communal group. ...	29

"Individualism," so-called, is therefore an unreal abstraction. . . . .	30
Further points in connection with the conception of society as an organic type are (1) its form, and (2) its self-consciousness. . . . .	33
Society is an organisation of the biological type, and our ideas of the individual and the community must be formed accordingly. . . . .	36

CHAPTER III.—THE ECONOMIC PERIOD.

Society exists for purposes of mutual aid, . . . . .	38
therefore a society whose functions are competitive evolves into Socialism . . . . .	39
Society develops through the political and the economic stages to the moral one. . . . . .	41
The political stage is governed by the necessities of a nation-making period, . . . . .	42
develops democratic forms . . . . .	44
and passes into the economic stage, . . . . .	47
which is at first competitive and individualistic. . . . .	47
This stage is now complete, . . . . .	50
because (1) sub-division of labour has gone about as far as it can, . . . . .	50
as is illustrated in shoe-making and tailoring ; . . . . .	52
(2) co-ordination of different trades has begun, . . . . .	54
as is illustrated by the Steel Trust, etc. ; . . . . .	54
(3) the power of capital, owing to facilities for communication, etc., has been too much increased to be socially safe, . . . . .	55
as illustrated by the use of machinery, etc. ; . . . . .	57
(4) competition is giving place to monopoly within certain areas, and . . . . .	62
(5) between others is developing into national wars ; and . . . . .	64
(6) the competitive state cannot meet certain demands made upon it. . . . .	65
